An Executive Order on Contractor Political Spending Disclosure Would Reach 70 Percent of Top Companies

An executive order requiring government contractors to disclose their political spending would reach at least 70 percent of the Fortune 100 companies.

Public Citizen reviewed the government contracts held by the 100 largest companies in the United States, as ranked by Fortune Magazine for 2014. To review government contracts, we relied on the federal procurement database maintained by the General Services Administration.

Our methodology was to search for contracts signed within the last year (dating back to April 2014). We aggregated totals to establish whether a company had received more than $100,000 in contracts over the last year. We included all categories of contracts, including delivery orders, purchase orders, and definitive contracts.

There are limitations to this methodology. There are potential problems with identifying the contracts of subsidiaries, which may lead to undercounting. Our methodology excluded companies that received contracts of $100,000 in prior years, even if those contracts extended into the past year, if they did not also receive $100,000 in contracts in the past year. There may be other limitations with the GSA database.

These limitations should not materially affect our findings; and on balance, they likely lead to undercounting. Additionally, two of the companies that did not receive $100,000 worth of contracts – Sears Holding and Supervalu, Inc. – received totals relatively close to the high threshold we selected for this review.

Our review found that 70 of the Fortune 100 companies had federal contracts totaling $100,000 or more in the period April 2014 – April 2015. This covers companies in a wide variety of industries, from defense to technology, energy to finance, entertainment to chemicals. The 30 companies that did not have $100,000 in contracts come disproportionately from the insurance industry.
