

The Bright Lines Project: Clarifying IRS Rules on Political Intervention

Drafting Committee Explanation

Interim Draft

Built upon four years of discussion and feedback, a committee of nine tax law experts, chaired by Greg Colvin (with Beth Kingsley as vice chair), has developed a set of six proposed rules which are designed to clarify the IRS regulations governing nonprofit organizations' political activities. This document contains the proposed rules, as well as explanations and a number of examples prepared by Committee members and Public Citizen staff.

The Colvin Committee also includes Eve Borenstein, Terence Dougherty, Rosemary Fei, Jim Joseph, Abby Levine, John Pomeranz, and Ezra Reese. Craig Holman and Lisa Gilbert, of Public Citizen's Congress Watch, have also contributed.

For further information, please contact Tom Halloran at thalloran@citizen.org or 202-454-5131. This draft represents the current state of the project as of July, 2013.

Introduction

In recent months, a report by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration revealed that over a two year period, improper search criteria were used by inadequately supervised IRS agents to select the exemption applications of 501(c)(4) organizations, as well as some 501(c)(3), (c)(5), and (c)(6) groups, for special scrutiny. The criteria were intended to identify advocacy organizations that might be involved in political campaign activity, but some of the terms used (e.g. "tea party") were biased in that they were more likely to refer to conservative than to liberal applicants. It has become apparent that a major factor in this systematic breakdown of the review process was the lack of clear, neutral, objective standards by which IRS employees and managers could determine whether applicants were engaged in political intervention.

In other words, the difficulty experienced in the nonprofit world, with many organizations very unsure of how to comply with the IRS' vague "facts and circumstances" approach to cases of political intervention, was mirrored inside the IRS, with line staff concocting their own selection criteria and managers unable to communicate useful guidance to them.

The Bright Lines Project aims to remedy both the internal and external problems created by the lack of a framework of definitions, exceptions, and analytical steps for recognizing and regulating political intervention within the tax-exempt sector.

In the wake of the Citizens United court decision, it seemed certain that there would be increased interest in how federal tax law defines and limits political activity by exempt organizations. Events of the 2012 campaign confirmed this. We have a clear indication from the majority of the Supreme Court that they are not happy with the chilling effect on First Amendment speech of complex rules with "open-ended rough-and-tumble" factors.

We don't know whether the Court would, in some future test case, invalidate the 1954 statutory ban on political campaign intervention by 501(c)(3) organizations, or uphold it based on the "subsidy" theory of Regan v. TWR. But even if the subsidy theory would support the prohibition on charitable electioneering, the complex, multi-factor, open-ended "facts and circumstances" test that the IRS uses to interpret the prohibition must now be considered highly vulnerable.¹

We think it's time to move to safe harbors, bright lines, predictability, simplicity and ease of understanding. Our draft proposal for new IRS regulations to redefine "political intervention" is summarized in six rules below.

Our central principle is this: the federal tax definition of political speech, aimed at withdrawing the subsidy of tax-exemption from political candidate-related activity, reaches beyond express advocacy and covers all speech that supports or opposes a candidate for elective public office. That broader test should be modeled on the test for lobbying activity that the IRS adopted in 1990, successfully drawing bright lines—any communication to any part of the electorate that (a) refers to a clearly identified candidate and (b) reflects a view on that candidate. Safe harbor exceptions should be constructed for commentary aimed at a public official's performance in office, for candidate comparisons based on an equal opportunity to speak, for responses to candidates who attack an organization or take aim at its issues, and for personal, oral expressions of opinion that may occur at an organization's meetings.

Now, the IRS "facts and circumstances" approach is vague and ambiguous, most of the time. We seek a new definition of political intervention that is clear and predictable, most of the time.

¹ We use "political intervention" as a consistent term of art to refer to candidate-related activity that is prohibited by Section 501(c)(3), may not be the primary purpose of other 501(c) organizations, and is subject to the proxy tax under Section 6033(e).

The Six Rules

1. Scope: Federal, state, local, and foreign election campaigns are included. “Candidate” is defined as a person who offers himself or herself for election to public office or whose election the organization expressly proposes, supports, or opposes.

2. Application: The definition applies consistently to (a) the prohibition on IRC 501(c)(3) organizations and the tax penalties under 4955 and 4945, (b) political intervention that is not within exempt purposes for other 501(c) groups, (c) the proxy tax paid by some 501(c) entities under 6033(e), and (d) the denial of a business expense deduction under 162(e)(1)(B).

3. Express Advocacy: It is political intervention to expressly advocate:

- (a) the election, defeat, nomination, or recall of a clearly-identified candidate;
- (b) the election or defeat of candidates affiliated with a specific political party;
- (c) that voters select candidates for support or opposition based on one or more criteria that clearly distinguish certain candidates from other candidates;
- (d) the making of contributions to a candidate, party, or any organization that has the primary purpose of engaging in political intervention.

4. General Speech Rule: If an organization’s action is a form of communication, other than express advocacy described above, the threshold definition of political intervention is: any communication to any part of the electorate that meets a two-part test --

- (a) it refers to a clearly-identified candidate and
- (b) it reflects a view on that candidate.

A communication (not described in Rule 3 above) that lacks either element is not intervention. Four safe harbor exceptions are available, but only if the communication does not consist of paid mass media advertising (defined on pages 14-15):

- (i) Influencing Official Action: Commentary on a public official that has a direct, limited, and reasonable relationship to specific actions the official may yet perform within his or her current term of office, without mention of any election or voting, or the person’s candidacy or opponent.
- (ii) Comparing Candidates: Voter education that compares two or more candidates for an office, and may include the organization’s views on such issues, if the communication consists solely of content in which the time, text, and/or space is offered in equal shares to each of the participating candidates, and the organization's share of content is no greater than the share available to any of the participating candidates. The opportunity to participate must be given, including a full description of the opportunity and a copy of the organization's content, to all current candidates (or to those meeting an objective threshold of viability) for election (or nomination) to the office a reasonable time in advance of the final preparation of the communication (which in no case may be less than 72 hours).

- (iii) Self-Defense: A response, as limited below, by an organization to a public or publicly-reported statement by a candidate that either (a) attacks the organization itself, or (b) comments upon a specific public policy position that the organization has taken publicly in furtherance of its exempt purpose within the prior year, or (c) results in press inquiries to the organization that were not solicited by the organization in the wake of the candidate's statement. The response by the organization must be educational, limited topically to addressing the candidate's statement, and as to (a) or (b), disseminated in a manner commensurate in medium and scale, and proximate in time, to the publicity of the candidate's statement, and as to (c), limited to dissemination to the requesting press organization.
- (iv) Personal, Oral Remarks at Official Meetings: Oral remarks made by anyone (other than a candidate) who is present in person at an official meeting of an organization held in a single room or location, so long as no announcement of the meeting refers to any candidate, party, election, or voting. This exception covers only oral remarks about candidates made by and to persons in attendance, not any other form of communication of those remarks, whether written, electronic, recorded, broadcast, or otherwise transmitted. A prominent disclaimer must be made to those attending, stating that such remarks are the speaker's personal opinion and are not made on behalf of the organization, and that the speaker is not advocating any of the actions set forth in Rule 3.

Evidence of intent in relation to the speech is irrelevant. A communication that refers to and reflects a view on a candidate, if not within an exception or specifically allowed under a Revenue Ruling or other federal tax authority, is subject to further analysis in which the organization bears the burden of proof to show why the speech is not political intervention.

5. Use of Resources: It is political intervention to provide any of the organization's resources, whether monetary or in-kind, goods, services, or facilities, tangible or intangible, by gift, loan, sale, rental, or any other method of transfer to another person or entity, if the transferee uses such resources to support or oppose any candidate's election to public office, if such use is reasonably foreseeable, and if the transferor has not taken reasonable steps to prevent such use.

Such transfers are not intervention, however, if the transfer is (a) made at no less than fair market value, (b) similar to other transactions conducted by the organization and (c) without preference for or against any candidate. Any other transfer recognized under applicable campaign finance law as a reportable contribution to a candidate for elective public office, or to an organization that has the primary purpose of engaging in political intervention, is political intervention.

Other uses of an organization's resources (transferred or not) in support of or in opposition to a candidate, if not specifically allowed under a Revenue Ruling or other federal tax authority, are subject to further analysis in which the organization bears the burden of proof to show why the use of resources is not political intervention.

6. Facts and Circumstances: Communications that meet the threshold speech test, do not come within an exception, and are targeted to voters in states, districts, or other locations where close election contests are occurring, are conclusively political intervention. In other cases, evidence of other facts or circumstances, such as timing, the range of issues discussed, disclaimers and disclosures, the organization's history, the impartiality of its methods, or corrective steps taken, shall be considered only in the organization's defense:

(a) to meet its burden of proof that intervention did not arise from its communications or use of resources, by showing that the conduct furthered a proper exempt or business purpose and was unrelated to intervening in the campaign of any candidate for public office or

(b) as mitigating factors affecting the penalty or remedy to be imposed upon violations.

Reasoning, Implications, Examples

Taking each of the six rules in turn:

1. Scope: Federal, state, local, and foreign election campaigns are included. "Candidate" is defined as a person who offers himself or herself for election to public office or whose election the organization expressly proposes, supports, or opposes.

A. Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code (IRC) states that a charitable organization must "not participate in, or intervene in (including the publishing or distributing of statements), any political campaign on behalf of (or in opposition to) any candidate for public office. No change to that brief statutory definition of "political intervention" is needed. It is understood that "campaigns" refers to electoral campaigns in which voters cast ballots to elect, nominate, recall, or confirm individuals seeking to hold public office.

B. The current Treasury Regulation interpreting this prohibition, set forth in § 1.501(c)(3)-1(c)(3)(iii), consists of only 113 words:

An organization is an action organization if it participates or intervenes, directly or indirectly, in any political campaign on behalf of or in opposition to any candidate for public office. The term candidate for public office means an individual who offers himself, or is proposed by others, as a contestant for an elective public office, whether such office be national, State, or local. Activities which constitute participation or intervention in a political campaign on behalf of or in opposition to a candidate include, but are not limited to, the publication or distribution of written or printed statements or the making of oral statements on behalf of or in opposition to such a candidate.

C. This regulation tells us very little beyond what is in the statute, only that:

- 1) Intervention can be direct or indirect.
- 2) A candidate is an individual who offers himself or is proposed by others as a contestant for elective public office.
- 3) Such office may be federal, state, or local.
- 4) Statements for or against a candidate may be oral or written.

D. The current definition of “candidate” is too broad, because it reaches anyone who may be “proposed by” someone else as a contestant. At any given time, there are dozens if not hundreds of prominent actors, business executives, athletes, governors, senators, authors, and other public figures that “others” have stated ought to run for president. The same is no doubt true in cities and towns as people mention the names of individuals who ought to be the next mayor. Mischief is not inconceivable—someone may be proposed as a candidate for a public office simply to prevent charitable organizations from promoting or criticizing them in a particular community.

E. Therefore, a brighter-line definition of “candidate” is needed, reaching only those who have announced themselves as candidates and those “whose election the organization expressly proposes, supports, or opposes.” Political intervention, then, would only pertain to unannounced candidates if the organization itself expressly took a position favoring or disfavoring their election to office. We decided against following the widely-disparate definitions used by various jurisdictions to determine who has qualified to appear on a ballot or who must file campaign finance reports (although any candidate who is on the ballot or has registered a campaign committee will almost certainly meet the standard of “offers himself”). This standard can be applied consistently across all jurisdictions.

F. The current regulation does not mention foreign elections. Yet American-based organizations do sometimes get involved in foreign elections, including in Israel, South Africa, and the recent example of a U.S. social welfare group favoring the election of a candidate in South Korea which the IRS denied 501(c)(4) exemption due to excessive political intervention (PLR 201214035). The regulation should encompass candidate elections in countries outside of the United States.

2. Application: The definition applies consistently to (a) the prohibition on IRC 501(c)(3) organizations and the tax penalties under 4955 and 4945, (b) political intervention that is not within exempt purposes for other 501(c) groups, (c) the proxy tax paid by some 501(c) entities under 6033(e), and (d) the denial of a business expense deduction under 162(e)(1)(B).

A. In proposing bright line rules for political intervention under IRC 501(c)(3), we intend that the same definition be applied universally throughout the Internal Revenue Code where political campaign activity is subject to special tax treatment. That includes IRC 4945(d)(2), imposing excise taxes on amounts paid or incurred by private foundations “to influence the outcome of any specific public election” and IRC 4955, imposing excise taxes on political intervention by public charities.

B. IRC 501(c)(4) social welfare organizations, as well as (c)(5) labor unions, and (c)(6) trade associations, are required to primarily engage in promoting social welfare (or qualifying 501(c)(5) or 501(c)(6) functions) to qualify for federal tax exemption – often referred to as a “primary purpose” test. Under Treasury Regulation § 1.501(c)(4)-1(a)(2), the promotion of social welfare does not include political intervention. Thus, the same definition of political intervention should be used to describe the non-qualifying activity for the 501(c)(4) and other non-charitable exempt organizations.

C. However, this project does not seek to define the quantity of political intervention that would be permissible and consistent with tax exemption for these non-charitable 501(c) categories. There is a range of views on that subject in the nonprofit world, from those who translate “less-than-primary” into 49% of annual expenditures (an approach that seems to be tacitly accepted by the IRS at present) to those who are distressed at the amount of anonymous “dark money” flowing through (c)(4)’s for political intervention and insist that “exclusively” in the statutory phrasing of 501(c)(4) should permit no substantial political spending. We focus only on the qualitative definition of political intervention and welcome the participation of those with widely differing positions on the quantitative debate.

D. Expenditures (mainly by for-profit businesses and their associations) that are taxable (under IRC 6033(e)) and non-deductible (under IRC 162(e)(1)(B)) include both lobbying activities (which are reasonably well-defined under existing regulations) and political intervention, which is not. Our universal tax definition of political intervention should be applied with equal force to the business realm.

E. We have considered that the one exception to universal application of our definition might be Section 527, both as to what constitutes an exempt activity for a Section 527 organization, and for what activities by other types of exempt organizations do not generate expenditures subject to tax under Section 527(f). For historical reasons related to the effort in 1976 to follow a pattern established by the Federal Election Campaign Act, and language that reaches beyond elections to appointive and political party offices, Section 527 has not been congruent with the other provisions that apply to political activity in the Internal Revenue Code. In practice, anything with a “nexus” to the candidate selection process has come within Section 527--even activities that might otherwise be deemed non-political, acceptable, and unlimited for 501(c) entities (see PLR 199925051 involving ballot measures). Section 527 is the least advantageous tax-exempt status, and so more borderline activities have been embraced.

F. In the event that our proposal is considered not just by the IRS but also by Congress, we would support extending our bright line rules in the form of statutory amendments to Section 527, so that the tax-exempt purpose (which could be more sensibly renamed “political function”) of a 527 organization would be congruent with the definition of political intervention that would apply throughout the rest of the Internal Revenue Code. Doing so would remove the troubling divergent elements in the Section 527 definition and better define expenditures subject to tax under Section 527(f) in order to simplify recordkeeping and compliance for affected 501(c) organizations. However, we recommend continuing the exemption of internal member communications and indirect fundraising and administrative costs, currently tax-free for 501(c) groups under the 527 regulations. We also suggest that any organization that cannot qualify for 501(c) tax-exemption due to excessive political activities (however that line may be drawn by the IRS and/or by Congress) should be able to qualify as a 527 organization. Finally, the political function of a 527 entity could be worded so as preserve its option to include any activity that it claims to have a reasonable nexus to its political function.

3. Express Advocacy: It is political intervention to expressly advocate:

(a) the election, defeat, nomination, or recall of a clearly-identified candidate;

(b) the election or defeat of candidates affiliated with a specific political party;

(c) that voters select candidates for support or opposition based on one or more criteria that clearly distinguish certain candidates from other candidates;

(d) the making of contributions to a candidate, party, or any organization that has the primary purpose of engaging in political intervention.

A. Historically, the IRS interpretation of the ban on political intervention by charities has been widely understood to go beyond express advocacy, to be absolute and prohibit all speech favoring or disfavoring a candidate. However, it is important to capture those instances of speech that do constitute express advocacy as a starting point for determining what speech undeniably should be within the definition of political intervention, without exception and without further consideration of any facts and circumstances.

B. "Express advocacy" in (a) above is defined starting with the rules and regulations of the Federal Election Campaign Act as a communication that expressly advocates the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate if it:

- 1) uses phrases such as 'vote for the President,' 're-elect your Congressman,' 'support the Democratic nominee,' 'cast your ballot for the Republican challenger for U.S. Senate in Georgia,' 'Smith for Congress,' 'Bill McKay in '94;' or
- 2) uses electioneering words in general phrases followed by a means of identifying specific candidates as targets, such as 'vote Pro-Choice' accompanied by a listing of clearly identified candidates described as Pro-Life or Pro-Choice, 'vote against Old Hickory,' 'defeat' accompanied by a picture of one or more candidate(s), 'reject the incumbent;' or
- 3) uses campaign slogan(s) or individual word(s), which in context, can have no other reasonable meaning than to urge the election or defeat of one or more clearly identified candidate(s), such as posters, bumper stickers, advertisements, etc. which say 'Nixon's the One,' 'Carter '76,' 'Reagan/Bush' or 'Mondale!'

C. "Express advocacy" also includes its functional equivalent: communications that are susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than a call to vote for or against a candidate, even if some other kind of action besides voting for or against a candidate is also encouraged.

An organization runs a newspaper ad with the following text:

The President of the United States continues degrading the electoral process and lessening the prestige of the office.

He continues to cultivate the fears, not the hopes, of the voting public by suggesting the choice is between "peace and war," "black or white," "north or south," and "Jew vs. Christian." His meanness of spirit is divisive and reckless McCarthyism at its worst. And from a man who once asked, "Why Not the Best?"

It is an attempt to hide his own record, or lack of it. If he succeeds the country will be burdened with four more years of incoherencies, ineptness and illusion, as he leaves a legacy of low-level campaigning. DON'T LET HIM DO IT.

This is political intervention because it is the functional equivalent of express advocacy.

Example 2

An organization in State X runs a television advertisement with the following text:

What kind of leader is Senator Doe? Ineffective. Ultra-liberal. Unrepresentative of our state's values. Senator Doe voted for increasing Tricare premiums to nickel and dime America's heroes. Veterans and service men and women know better than to trust Senator Doe. This November: support new voices, support your military, support State X values."

This is also campaign intervention because it is the functional equivalent of express advocacy.

D. Internal Revenue Code provisions on political intervention refer only to "any candidate for public office" (singular, not plural), not to any undefined group of candidates, such as a political party. Party labels are often used in legislative and other policy discussions, and should not be automatically treated as a reference to candidacy. However, where a political party label is used to identify specific candidates or groups of candidates in a message expressly advocating their election or defeat, this is intervention. Other speech that favors or disfavors a party does not necessarily come within the definition of political intervention. (There is a second federal tax doctrine that captures situations where a charity provides significant support to a political party: more than incidental "private benefit" to a private interest violates 501(c)(3) under the American Campaign Academy decision, which found that a campaign school operated for the benefit of the Republican Party was not charitable.)

E. So, a charity could make statements for or against Democratic or Republican reforms or ideology or legislative conduct without violating 501(c)(3), but favoring election of "the Democrat" or "the Republican" for president, or favoring a change in the party in power is political intervention in support of a candidate. Likewise, statements such as "vote Democratic" or "vote Republican" without reference to a specific office, but in the context of an election in which candidates representing each party are competing for various offices, are intervention.

F. Considerable debate has been generated by the IRS position as described by the court in the Catholic Answers case [CITE] regarding the legitimacy of "litmus tests" in which an organization expressly advocates selecting or rejecting candidates based on certain criteria, but without naming any such candidates and without referring to a specific election contest where it is clear which candidate is identified. Instructing people how to vote in this way should be political intervention. A charity should be able to suggest that voters consider such features as the candidate's military background, position on abortion, views on climate change, age, willingness to raise taxes, ethnicity, etc., so long as it does not expressly advocate voting for or against them based on those criteria. "Deny communion to pro-choice candidates" would not be express advocacy.

G. Likewise, "voter pledges," where a charity asks voters to pledge not to vote for a candidate who would raise taxes, or to vote for a candidate who favors single-payer health care, are express advocacy under part (c) of the standard above and therefore political intervention.

H. Finally, even if the message does not call for the election or defeat of a candidate, it should be political intervention to expressly advocate for the making of contributions to a candidate, party, or IRC 527 political organization of any kind, because it is impossible to do so without supporting or opposing one or more candidates for elective office.

4. General Speech Rule: If an organization's action is a form of communication, other than express advocacy described above, the threshold definition of political intervention is: any communication to any part of the electorate that meets a two-part test--

(a) it refers to a clearly-identified candidate and

(b) it reflects a view on that candidate.

A communication (not described in Rule 3 above) that lacks either element is not intervention. Four safe harbor exceptions are available, but only if the communication does not consist of paid mass media advertising (defined on pages 14-15):

- (i) Influencing Official Action: Commentary on a public official that has a direct, limited, and reasonable relationship to specific actions the official may yet perform within his or her current term of office, without mention of any election or voting, or the person's candidacy or opponent.
- (ii) Comparing Candidates: Voter education that compares two or more candidates for an office, and may include the organization's views on such issues, if the communication consists solely of content in which the time, text, and/or space is offered in equal shares to each of the participating candidates, and the organization's share of content is no greater than the share available to any of the participating candidates. The opportunity to participate must be given, including a full description of the opportunity and a copy of the organization's content, to all current candidates (or to those meeting an objective threshold of viability) for election (or nomination) to the office a reasonable time in advance of the final preparation of the communication (which in no case may be less than 72 hours).
- (iii) Self-Defense: A response, as limited below, by an organization to a public or publicly-reported statement by a candidate that either (a) attacks the organization itself, or (b) comments upon a specific public policy position that the organization has taken publicly in furtherance of its exempt purpose within the prior year, or (c) results in press inquiries to the organization that were not solicited by the organization in the wake of the candidate's statement. The response by the organization must be educational, limited topically to addressing the candidate's statement, and as to (a) or (b), disseminated in a manner commensurate in medium and scale, and proximate in time, to the publicity of the candidate's statement, and as to (c), limited to dissemination to the requesting press organization.

- (iv) *Personal, Oral Remarks at Official Meetings: Oral remarks made by anyone (other than a candidate) who is present in person at an official meeting of an organization held in a single room or location, so long as no announcement of the meeting refers to any candidate, party, election, or voting. This exception covers only oral remarks about candidates made by and to persons in attendance, not any other form of communication of those remarks, whether written, electronic, recorded, broadcast, or otherwise transmitted. A prominent disclaimer must be made to those attending, stating that such remarks are the speaker's personal opinion and are not made on behalf of the organization, and that the speaker is not advocating any of the actions set forth in Rule 3.

Evidence of intent in relation to the speech is irrelevant. A communication that refers to and reflects a view on a candidate, if not within an exception or specifically allowed under a Revenue Ruling or other federal tax authority, is subject to further analysis in which the organization bears the burden of proof to show why the speech is not political intervention.

General Speech Rule

A. The general speech rule we propose goes well beyond express advocacy, but uses a logical word formula limited to speech that favors or disfavors a candidate, then determines whether the speech comes within a justifiable exception, and only if the speech does not, allows application of a “facts and circumstances” analysis in the organization’s defense.

B. We are proposing a bright line “gateway” rule for non-express advocacy speech, the “refer to and reflect a view” two-part test. This test has worked well for over twenty years as the definition of lobbying used by the IRS in regulations that apply to public charities, private foundations, as well as business taxpayers and their associations. It works in the election context also, where initiatives, bonds, and other ballot measures are up for a public vote. The following describes the two prongs of this test.

C. The first prong of this non-express advocacy speech test requires reference to a clearly-identified candidate—by name, image, title, voice, or other reference that is unambiguous in the context of the communication. Communications that reflect the organization’s views about campaign issues are permitted if they don’t refer to any candidate. Thus it is not political intervention for an organization to attempt to inject its issues into a campaign; it may make public statements indicating that the candidates should address these issues in a certain way. An organization also may suggest that members of the public ask the candidates for a specific elective office what their views are on an issue of interest to the organization including in communications in which the organization expresses its own view on those issues, so long as it does not expressly advocate that people select candidates using those views as criteria (see Rule 3(c)).

D. The second prong of the general speech rule — reflect a view — is a broad standard. It will cover any form of speech (such as endorsements, paid ads, websites, mailings, books, films, sermons, speeches, journals, and signs) that indicates a bias or favoritism of any kind. The view could be positive, negative, or nuanced, and it could be expressed internally to members or externally to the public.

1) A reference will be considered to reflect a view if a reasonable, independent reader/listener/viewer could discern the speaker's view based on the contents of the communication with limited reference to the context in which it is made. This does not mean that one will assess all relevant "facts and circumstances," but that plainly understandable references to campaign slogans, widely publicized current events, or a campaign's latest gaffe need not be ignored.

2) This standard does not require that the communication reflect a view about the candidate as a candidate, either explicitly or implicitly. The rule will cover speech that reflects a view about a candidate, e.g., as an incumbent legislator, as a human being, as a parent, as an orator, or in any other former or current profession or capacity.²

3) This speech test is stricter than express advocacy, stricter than the functional equivalent of express advocacy, stricter than the Furgatch test, and stricter than the "promote, attack, support, or oppose" rubric. Any view reflected, favorable or unfavorable, any bias or tilt toward an identified candidate in the communication to voters, crosses the line, unless it fits within a safe harbor exception.

4) Implementation of this rule would mean that organizations would no longer need to guess, at their peril, about the IRS' judgment regarding whether their expression of their view on an issue of importance to the organization constitutes political intervention. The current multiple-factor rules applicable to issue advocacy in Rev. Rul. 2004-6 and 2007-41—e.g., whether the organization is a "wedge" issue distinguishing the candidates, whether the organization had a past record of advocacy on an issue, whether the communication was "close" to an election—would no longer be applicable if the communication did not refer to and reflect a view on a candidate.

5) The general speech test allows a broad range of voter education activities that refer to specific candidates but do so neutrally, without favoritism. Educating the public about candidates' views on issues of importance to the public or to the organization would be permissible as long as it is done in a manner that does not reflect a view on the candidates. To avoid the "gateway" speech test, the organization would not include its own view on the issue in the communication since that would be seen as reflecting a view by allowing the audience or readers to compare the candidates' views to the organization's view (but see the safe harbor below for comparing candidates' positions on an issue to the organization's position). Further, the organization must use reasonable, objective criteria to decide which candidates' positions to include in the communication, and must not give certain candidates more space/time/text than others, or give a greater opportunity to participate in the communication or event to some candidates compared to others.

6) This would mean that an organization may engage in voter education activities such as (1) preparing and disseminating a candidate questionnaire in which the organization publishes the responses of at least two candidates to questions of importance to the organization or to the general public (a video questionnaire also would be permissible), (2) compiling and disseminating statements made to the public by candidates on their own initiative about campaign issues, (3) distributing information that is factual only, without any element of opinion, such as data from campaign finance reports showing the sources and amounts of each candidate's contributions, (4) conducting and presenting the results of scientific surveys of public opinion, including voters' candidate preferences prior to elections, and (5) sponsoring and preparing the questions to be asked during a candidate debate—all without reflecting the organization's view in the communication or during the event. This is consistent with, and generalizes the logic of, Revenue Ruling 78-248 on voter education, but avoids the troublesome "broad range of issues" requirement.

7) Asking a candidate to make a pledge (no new taxes), endorse a policy (single-payer health care), or take a stand (on genocide in Darfur), can be done as a method of gaining the candidates' acceptance of the organization's position and asking them to take a public stand. Revenue Ruling 76-456, which prohibits even asking the question, should be modified so that it is not intervention to ask candidates for their pledge or endorsement on an issue. Whether this results in the organization "reflecting a view" depends on the responses. If all the candidates say "yes," there's no bias in presenting that result to the public. If no candidate says "yes," that could be presented neutrally, i.e. the organization is still pursuing a policy despite the fact no candidate yet favors it. If some say yes and others no, the organization's presentation of that result would reflect a view, and so it must refrain from publicizing the candidates' responses (although some candidates may decide to take a public stand on their own) to avoid the threshold definition of political intervention.

8) The applications of the "reflect a view" principle described above reveal a key characteristic of this prong of the general speech test: it is a "net" view that favors one candidate over another that we are concerned about. If the outcome of the voter education activity or the candidate pledge is to create an equally favorable or unfavorable view of all contestants, the organization may achieve its objective of injecting its issues into the election campaign without engaging in political intervention.

E. If the communication does refer to a clearly-identified candidate and reflects a view on that candidate, the general speech rule has three safe harbor exceptions, but not for paid mass media advertising. A proposed definition of paid mass media advertising is the following: "A communication to the general public, placed for a fee on one of the following media, operated by another person: a broadcast, cable, or satellite facility, newspaper, magazine, outdoor advertising facility, mass mailing service, telephone bank, or another person's web site or internet communications service. As of January 1 of even-numbered years, the Internal Revenue Service shall issue a public notice modifying the list as needed to include substantially similar media as changes in communications technology occur."

1) Because this rule is so broad at the outset, we consider that certain exceptions are necessary to protect appropriate non-political speech. However, because a safe harbor absolutely protects any speech that it covers, without regard to any other facts, and because by definition that speech already is known to reflect a view on a candidate, these exceptions present a potential avenue for abuse. Surreptitious campaign speech potentially covered by these safe harbors seems most likely to rely on paid mass media rather than, for example, statements on an organization's own web site, or speeches at a membership meeting. The proposed definition draws on existing FEC rules, which seem reasonably calibrated to cover the mechanisms most used by political operatives.

2) However, we live in a time where the very nature of mass media is evolving. More and more commercial television, for example, is viewed via Internet delivery than broadcast or cable. Given the rapid pace with which technology is developing, it would be a mistake to adopt a fixed definition of "paid mass media." Any definition that applies to early 21st century technology and consumer habits will likely be obsolete well before the middle of this century. Therefore, we propose that the IRS should revisit the types of communications media that are covered in order to keep pace with contemporary developments. Similarly, utilization patterns may change, and some organizations may be able to take high-impact media in-house, ranging from phone banks and mass mailings to television stations or channels. The IRS should be able to include such media operations on the bi-annual list of paid mass media advertising instrumentalities.

Safe Harbor: Influencing Official Action

F. Considering the strong First Amendment protection of the right to "petition the Government for a redress of grievances," public officials should not be shielded from criticism by tax-exempt organizations, even if the official is also running for re-election or for election to another public office. Therefore, the first exception to the speech test should be constructed to allow communications that reflect a view on a public official who is also a candidate, so long as the speech has a direct, limited, and reasonable relationship to specific actions the official may yet perform within his or her current term of office, without mention of any future election or voting, or the person's candidacy or opponent. The speech is direct if it refers expressly to the specific action. It is limited if it does not go beyond facts and arguments that pertain to the specific action that the organization is attempting to influence. It is reasonable if the speech has a logical and visible connection, apparent to the audience, between the portrayal of the public official and persuading him or her to take the specific action.

G. This exception is broad enough to permit grass roots lobbying on legislation or other policy choices, even if the messaging does call attention to an officeholder's good or bad stance on an issue that may also be prominent in that officeholder's campaign for re-election or higher office. Note that this safe harbor is not equally available to criticism of the positions of a candidate who is not a sitting officeholder. However, as discussed below in Rule 6, an organization criticizing a challenger who is not a public official may be able to demonstrate that its activity was not political intervention by showing that its communication was unrelated to the election campaign and was merely an extension and integral part of its exempt activities.

H. An official may yet perform an action within his or her term of office if there are objective, ascertainable facts that make it reasonable to conclude there is a significant chance that an opportunity to take or not take the action will be presented to or initiated by the official. It is not required to be a certainty, but something more than a theoretical possibility is required.

I. This safe harbor is not available for communications disseminated via paid mass media advertising. For paid mass media advertising communications, grassroots advocacy must avoid reflecting a view on a clearly-identified candidate to avoid meeting the threshold definition of political intervention. Alternatively, an organization sponsoring mass media ads may use all the facts and circumstances to demonstrate that its activity was not political intervention, as described more fully below under Rule 6. Following are examples showing the operation of this safe harbor exception, using communications other than paid mass media ads:

Example 3

University O, a section 501(c)(3) organization, is located in State V. Senator C represents State V in the United States Senate. Shortly before an election in which Senator C is a candidate, University O places a blog post on its website stating that S. 24, a pending bill in the United States Senate, would provide additional opportunities for State V residents to attend college, but Senator C has opposed similar measures in the past. The post ends with the statement “Call or write Senator C to tell him to vote for S. 24.” S. 24 is scheduled for a vote in the United States Senate soon after the date that the blog post is published. Even though the post appears shortly before the election and identifies Senator C’s position on the issue as contrary to O’s position, University O has not violated the political campaign intervention prohibition because the post does not mention the election or the candidacy of Senator C, her opponent, or voting, and the timing of the message and the identification of Senator C have a direct, limited and reasonable relationship to the specifically identified legislation University O is supporting. For the purposes of this example, it does not matter whether education in general or this issue in particular has been made into a campaign issue by Senator C or her opponents; an section 501(c)(3) organization need not be silent on issues merely because they have been discussed in a campaign context.

Organization R sends an e-mail urging an increase in state funding for public education in State X, which requires a legislative appropriation. Governor E is the governor of State X. The e-mail is sent to individuals residing in State X beginning shortly before an election in which Governor E is a candidate for re-election. The people on the list who received the e-mail have signed up to receive action alerts from R. The e-mail cites numerous statistics indicating that public education in State X is underfunded, and describes Governor E's position as against more funding for public education. The e-mail ends: "Tell Governor E what you think about our under-funded schools" and provides a link to Governor E's official website. At the time the e-mail is sent, no legislative vote or other major legislative activity is scheduled in the State X legislature on state funding of public education. Organization R has engaged in political intervention because the e-mail identifies Governor E, reflects a view on her position, and does not have a limited, reasonable, and direct relationship to specific actions the Governor may yet perform. Political intervention could be avoided by either removing reference to the Governor's current position, or – if facts permit – limiting the criticism to a position on a particular bill that will soon be subject to the Governor's signature or veto, or to a budget proposal that the Governor has made or is expected to make soon (before the election).

Example 5

Organization S prepares and distributes a posting on a social media site criticizing the fact that state C's two senators voted against the Marriage Protection Amendment, and asking viewers to call them to urge them to support it. Contemporary news reports indicate that it is likely, but not certain, that a vote will be scheduled on the Marriage Protection Amendment in the near future. Organization S has not engaged in political intervention. However, if there was no reasonable chance that a vote on the issue would be held before the election, the communication would not qualify for the safe harbor.

Example 6

Organization Z sends a letter to its members referencing Congressman Y. Although Congressman Y is a candidate for re-election, the letter is not sent close to an election. The letter discusses Congressman Y's history of spousal abuse and asks viewers to call him to support family values. The letter constitutes political campaign intervention. Although Congressman Y will, as part of his official duties, consider issues regarding family values, the letter's criticism of him does not have a direct, limited, or reasonable relationship to any official action. A reference to an upcoming, specific vote on family values legislation would not make this letter permissible, as the criticism of Congressman Y is a broad, personal attack that would lack a limited, reasonable relationship to the official action.

Example 7

Organization Q produces and distributes a pamphlet, that compares and contrasts two candidates for Congress. It attacks the incumbent Congressman for his stance on corporate pension funds, and praises his opponent for promoting legislation on the issue. The pamphlet asks individuals to "call or visit our website to find out more." The pamphlet is political intervention, even assuming it referred to a specific action the incumbent may yet perform, because it references his opponent.

Example 8

Organization B creates a website that aids voters in finding their polling places and encourages them to vote. The website includes a passage that praises the position of the President on an environmental issue and encourages voters to "make sure your voice is heard on election day." The President is a candidate for re-election. This website constitutes political intervention because it reflects a view on a public official who is a candidate for re-election and references voting and the election.

Example 9

Organization L supported the passage of healthcare reform legislation. After Congressman B voted for the legislation, Organization L sent a letter to its members commending him for this vote and asking them to call him and thank him for his stance. This letter does not meet the safe harbor, because there is no direct, limited or reasonable relationship to any future official action. However, as discussed below, the organization may be able to carry its burden to demonstrate no political intervention by showing that the "thank you" message was unrelated to the election campaign and was merely an extension and integral part of its lobbying on the legislation.

Safe Harbor: Comparing Candidates

J. This safe harbor exception is intended to allow candidate comparisons that may, in their resulting presentation to voters, reflect a "net" view that is favorable or unfavorable to one or more of the candidates. However, the candidate comparisons covered by this exception are constructed so as to provide a fair and even-handed opportunity to the candidates to participate and to react to the viewpoints expressed by the organization. The theory is that the candidates each have an equal opportunity to control the content of their share of the communication and to present themselves favorably and so if they not do so, it is not the fault of the organization conducting the comparison. This exception is also designed for organizations that have a single-issue focus and for groups that cannot avoid being known to have a position on the issues discussed by the candidates. Such organizations need a vehicle to engage the candidates on issues of importance to them and educate the public, without the risk of IRS prosecution for political intervention. Voter education activities that are structured to be completely neutral (as discussed above) in their end result would not be captured by the basic general speech test and would not need the protection of this safe harbor.

1) A candidate comparison covered by this exception could be a candidate debate, a request for a 30 second video statement from each candidate on a topic, responses to a questionnaire, voter guides based on material from each candidate's website, or the results of asking candidates to take a pledge on an issue.

2) The organization itself could take a position on the matters presented to the candidates, even though it may indicate the its own preferred view, because each candidate has an opportunity equal to that of the organization to counteract its stance.

3) The invitation to the candidates to participate must be given a reasonable time before the presentation to the public is finalized. While the legal minimum is set at 72 hours, the time that would be considered reasonable may be longer, depending on the circumstances. Attempting to schedule a Presidential candidate three days in advance for a live, broadcast candidate debate is not likely to be reasonable. Ultimately, the time allowed for response must be set to allow all candidates a fair opportunity to participate if they choose.

Safe Harbor: Self-Defense

K. A third safe harbor would apply to certain communications that reflect a view on a candidate when they are made in self-defense by the organization. An organization should not be required to be silent when a candidate makes statements the organization reasonably believes to be critical of the organization or puts the organization in a bad light. Nor should it be required to be silent when a candidate makes a statement on a public policy position that the organization has taken publicly (e.g., in press releases, publicly-available newsletters, on its website, or in other public statements, in legislative testimony, in comments on proposed rulemaking, and in documents filed in connection with litigation matters) in furtherance of its exempt purpose within the prior year, or if the organization receives press inquiries triggered by the candidate's statement and not solicited by the organization.

1) However, in such case, the organization's ability to reflect a view must be limited to expressing its disagreement (or agreement) with the candidate's statement. It may not otherwise reflect a view on the candidate.

2) Further, in expressing its reaction, the organization's communication must be educational, as opposed to polemical, by meeting the requirements of educational methodology set forth in Rev. Proc. 86-43. As explained in more detail that Revenue Procedure, a communication is less likely to be deemed educational under this standard if it expresses views unsupported by facts, distorts facts to support its views, relies heavily on inflammatory language, offers conclusions based on appeals to emotion rather than objective evaluation, or does not appear to be aimed at developing the recipient's understanding of the subject matter.

3) In situations covered by this safe harbor, where the organization's response reflecting its view is permitted either because (i) the candidate made a statement the organization reasonably believes to be critical of the organization or puts the organization in a bad light or (ii) the candidate made a statement on a public policy position that the organization has taken publicly in furtherance of its exempt purpose within the prior year, the organization's response must not go beyond the scope of the triggering communication:

a. The organization's response must be disseminated through a medium that does not exceed the level of audience engagement through which the triggering communication by the candidate was disseminated.

Example 10

A candidate for statewide office makes a derogatory statement about Organization Q that is reported in single a local newspaper article and not picked up by any other media outlets. Q's communications staff manages to book its Executive Director for an extended interview slot on a major national Sunday morning news show. This response does not qualify for the safe harbor because it exceeds the level of audience engagement of the triggering communication.

b. The response must not deliberately exceed the scale of the triggering communication in terms of attempting to reach more outlets than did the original communication

Example 11

Same facts as Example 10, but Q holds a press conference in the state capital to which it invites hundreds of print, online, and broadcast journalist, and sends an alert to hundreds of national media outlets. This reaction does not qualify for the safe harbor because it deliberately exceeds the scale of the triggering communication by attempting to reach more outlets.

c. The response must follow the triggering communication closely in time.

Example 12

Same facts as above, but the article appears in April. In October, Q responds with a scathing rebuttal posted on the home page of its web site. This response does not qualify for the safe harbor because it is not close in time to the triggering communication.

4) In situations where the organization's response is permitted solely because of press inquiries unsolicited by the organization in the wake of the candidate's statement, the organization may only respond to the inquiring press organizations and allow the media outlet to disseminate its response.

Example 13

Same facts as above, but Q has not responded to the article. It accepts an invitation for its executive director to appear on a TV talk show to comment on the candidate's statement, but, assuming her statements reflect a view on the candidate any further dissemination of the interview via Twitter, YouTube, or Q's website will not qualify for the safe harbor.

Example 14

A candidate says “my opponent is a card-carrying member of the ACLU,” and the ACLU reasonably believes that statement to be critical of this fact, and therefore by implication critical of the ACLU, and responds by saying “All our supporters are proud to be members of the ACLU and we are proud to have their support.” The ACLU response qualifies for the safe harbor and is not political intervention.

Example 15

Organization P has represented the defendant in a high-profile death penalty defense case. A candidate publicizes the defendant’s crime to illustrate how the judicial system is soft on criminals and should pay more attention to the victims. P may promptly respond to the candidate’s comments regarding the crime with a description of its version of the case and its implications without otherwise reflecting a view on the candidate.

Example 16

Same facts as in 15, but the case was one that P worked on many years ago and the candidate’s statements publicizing the crime were made many years prior. P’s revival of its dispute with the candidate during the election would not fall within the safe harbor.

Example 17

Same facts as 16, except the news media have unearthed the old statement and turned it into a fresh controversy. In light of the extensive coverage being given in the press to the candidate’s negative comments about P, P holds a series of meetings with editorial boards to encourage them to write supportive editorials highlighting the good work P does and explaining its view of the facts of the criminal case. P’s response qualifies for the safe harbor because it is responding to current coverage, and the resulting editorials will be disseminated in a similar medium to the triggering news coverage, and will not deliberately exceed the scale of the audience for the triggering communication.

Example 18

In the wake of a widely reported controversy about a museum’s display of art featuring religious symbols, a candidate urges de-funding of the National Endowment for the Arts for its support of “offensive” art. W, an arts organization eligible for receiving NEA funding responds by issuing a press release to major media outlets in support of NEA funding, specifically referencing the recent comments by the candidate and disagreeing with them. So long as it does not otherwise reflect a view on the candidate its response will fall into the safe harbor and not be political intervention.

Example 19

A candidate promotes a proposal for a flat tax as a centerpiece of her campaign, appearing on several television talk shows. The policy director of Z, an organization whose major program activity is to analyze and educate the public on tax policy accepts an (unsolicited) invitation to appear on a television program, criticizing the candidate's proposal, and calling the policy "unworkable and naïve." So long as the policy director does not otherwise reflect a view on the candidate, Z has not engaged in political intervention.

Example 20

E is an organization that focuses on the impact of environmental policy decisions on low income communities. Following a statement made by a candidate that the fact of anthropogenic climate change is not backed by science, a reporter calls E and asks whether the organization agrees that anthropogenic climate change is not backed by science. E does not consider climate change a major priority area and has not previously taken a position on this issue, although similar organizations consider climate change a major threat to low income people around the globe. It responds to the reporter's question including disagreeing with the statement made by the candidate without otherwise reflecting a view on the candidate. E's response is not political intervention because it is a response to a press inquiry.

Example 21

P is an organization that monitors and reports on the activities of violent anti-immigrant groups. P reports on its website that an individual who is currently a candidate for public office was, ten years previously, a featured speaker at a rally sponsored by a group promoting a shoot-on-sight policy to halt illegal crossings of the U.S.-Mexican border. P's report is not covered by the safe harbor because this communication is not proximate in time with the candidate's statement at the rally.

Example 22

Candidate X is seeking nomination from her party to run for election to the presidency. During a candidate debate that is widely covered in the national print media, Candidate X states that global climate change is not backed by science. Following the debate, an organization whose mission is educating the public about the realities of global climate change flies a plane over the arena in which the Candidate X's party's convention is being held dragging a banner that states, "CANDIDATE X IS IN DENIAL!" This communication does not qualify for the safe harbor because it is not educational within the meaning of Rev. Proc. 86-43.

Example 23

V is an organization whose mission is ensuring women's access to contraception. Following publication on the website of a small village newspaper of Candidate Y's statement during a stump speech at an Elk's Club that doctors should be able to refuse to provide contraceptives to women, the president of V appears on the Today Show and criticizes Candidate Y's statement. This statement does not qualify for the safe harbor because it is not similar in scale to the candidate's stump speech as reported on a local newspaper's website.

L. In addition to our four specifically described exceptions, we believe that any communications that are explicitly allowed under existing guidance should continue to be permitted, even if the speech meets the basic speech test for political intervention. The rule that paid mass media advertising cannot qualify for a safe harbor would not disqualify a message from protection under this part of the rule. If it is specifically treated as not campaign intervention under existing (or future) federal tax authority, it will not be treated as intervention. For instance, a legislative report card that meets the criteria of Rev. Rul. 80-282 would be permitted. A communication treated as not intervention in any of the examples of Rev. Rul. 2004-6 or Rev. Rul. 2007-41³ would similarly continue to be treated as not political intervention, whether or not the communication met our criteria for safe harbor exceptions. In addition, communications treated as intervention under existing rulings might be considered not to be intervention depending upon the application of these new rules. (For example, a voting record that meets the criteria of Rev. Rul. 78-248 Situation 4 could qualify for a safe harbor exemption if it is published on an organization's own web site as part of a lobbying effort.)

M. Evidence of intent in relation to the speech is irrelevant. A communication that refers to and reflects a view on a candidate, if not within a safe harbor exception or specifically allowed under existing authority, meets the threshold definition of political intervention. On further analysis the organization may draw on all relevant facts and circumstances to demonstrate why the speech is not political intervention as discussed in Rule 6, but it bears the burden of proof to do so.

Safe Harbor: Personal, Oral Remarks at Official Meetings

N. This fourth safe harbor is the most recent addition to the Six Rules proposal and may undergo further development. This exception would not allow express advocacy, barred by Rule 3 in all situations. It would permit a pastor to express his or her personal views on candidates from the pulpit. It would also allow parents at a PTA meeting, including officers, to express their views on candidates for school board. It would permit speeches, sermons, or discussions at any meeting of any tax-exempt organization to include expressions of opinion on those running for public office in upcoming elections, so long as such views were not made officially or on behalf of the organization.

O. It would not require that meetings be limited wholly or primarily to "members" or that such meetings be held at the organization's building or that such meetings be regularly scheduled. However, the meeting must be held in one, not multiple rooms or locations.⁴ No announcement of the meeting, in any advance publicity, invitation, bulletin, signage, or other form of message, would alert attendees that the subjects discussed at the meeting may include commentaries on candidates. This is to prevent the organization from using the exception to magnify the impact of the speakers' remarks by advertising the potential political content of the event. The two-part disclaimer would help ensure that both the speaker and the audience understand that the safe harbor protects only personal, not official, remarks and that it does not protect express advocacy statements.

P. This exception does not currently exist under IRS interpretations. Revenue Ruling 2007-41 indicates that statements made by officers of an organization at official meetings can never be personal and will always be attributed to the organization. This exception would provide a protected space for the private expression of personal views (without express advocacy) at such meetings without adverse consequence to tax-exempt status. Personal or official comments at meetings conducted in other ways, or with advance publicity, or with candidates present, or without disclaimers, may still be defensible under another exception, under a Revenue Ruling or other federal tax authority, or under the facts and circumstances offered by the organization in its defense under Rule 6 .

5. Use of Resources: It is political intervention to provide any of the organization's resources, whether monetary or in-kind, goods, services, or facilities, tangible or intangible, by gift, loan, sale, rental, or any other method of transfer to another person or entity, if the transferee uses such resources to support or oppose any candidate's election to public office and the transferor has not taken reasonable steps to prevent such use.

Such transfers are not intervention, however, if the transfer is (a) made at no less than fair market value, (b) similar to other transactions conducted by the organization and (c) without preference for or against any candidate. Any other transfer recognized under applicable campaign finance law as a reportable contribution to a candidate for elective public office, or to an organization that has the primary purpose of engaging in political intervention, is political intervention.

Other uses of an organization's resources (transferred or not) in support of or opposition to a candidate, if not specifically allowed under a Revenue Ruling or other federal tax authority, are subject to further analysis in which the organization bears the burden of proof to show why the use of resources is not political intervention.

⁴ The requirements that the participants be in a single room and that remarks be "oral" should nonetheless allow reasonable accommodations to allow disabled participants to use text-based or other communications technologies or to participate from a remote location, but not to permit mass conference calls, webinars or other broad, open public meetings.

A. There are ways that an organization can intervene in a candidate election that do not involve speech by the organization, but rather constitute the use of the organization's resources to help or hurt a candidate. This proposed rule has five analytic steps:

1) It begins with a basic two-part test applied to any form of transfer of the organization's resources to another person or entity: (a) were the resources used by the transferee to support or oppose a candidate and, if so, (b) did the organization take reasonable steps to prevent such use? It is followed by two specific rules: one that provides a safe harbor and another that results in an automatic finding of intervention.

2) The safe harbor test applies if all three prongs are met--the transfer is at no less than fair market value, it is similar to other transactions conducted by the organization (outside of any political context), and it is made without candidate preference.

3) A finding of political intervention occurs automatically if the transfer is a reportable political contribution related to a candidate election under applicable federal, state or local (or foreign) campaign finance laws, unless it is safe under the prior three-prong test.

4) Other uses of resources to support or oppose a candidate, not involving any transfer, would be examined under a facts and circumstances analysis in which the organization has the burden of proof to show that its action was not political intervention under Rule 6.

5) However, if a Revenue Ruling or other tax precedent treats the specific use as not political intervention, then it is not.

B. The initial two-part test is similar to wording found in the regulations for Section 527 organizations, which state that an expenditure by a 501(c) organization that is taxable under 527(f) may be made directly or indirectly through another organization. If the transferee eventually uses the asset for political activities, the transferor is not absolutely liable for tax if it takes "reasonable steps" to ensure that the transferee does not use the resource for political activities. What is "reasonable" under 527(f) depends upon all the facts and circumstances, but we should provide some safe harbors for transfers such as those that qualify under other Treasury Regulations as controlled grants or as expenditure responsibility grants, which prescribe certain steps for oversight by grantors (e.g. prohibiting use of grant funds for political intervention in a written agreement).

C. The safe harbor addresses and employs some of the same concepts that appear as "business activity" issues in Revenue Ruling 2007-41. However, that Ruling is an open-ended multi-factor test and the proposed safe harbor is stricter, with three definite prongs. The proposed rule requires that the transaction be at fair market value rather than customary and usual rates, which could be below market and contain an element of subsidy. The second prong would require a history or practice of providing the resource to others, not just candidates. The third prong simply requires no preference for or against any candidate. As in Revenue Ruling 2007-41, that means that the resource is available to candidates in the same election on an equal basis. The organization can provide the resource to one candidate, and is not required to affirmatively take steps to offer it to other candidates, nor to provide it to other candidates if no others request to use it. The organization cannot decline similar requests from other candidates, and must demonstrate even-handedness, i.e., it cannot reach out to offer the resource to one candidate and not to opposing candidates in the same way.

D. An organization that makes a contribution to support or oppose a candidate, or a group of candidates via a party committee or a multiple-candidate political fund, must expect that using its resources in such a way will constitute political intervention. Unlike speech, where the tax law standard is much higher than the election law standard of express advocacy, it is helpful to look to applicable federal, state, or local election law standards for the recognition and measurement of material values applied to the end of supporting or opposing a candidate. Using the applicable election law standard for intervention as the guide for the tax rule is beneficial because, under many factual situations, it will mean that the taxpayer will have one rule to follow for both tax and election law purposes.

E. Thus, any transfer of the organization's funds or resources that is reportable under applicable jurisdictional law regulating the reporting of political contributions (i.e., federal, state, or local) is conclusively political intervention. If the value of the use of the organization's funds or resources is below the dollar threshold for reporting in any such jurisdiction, the use may still constitute political intervention under the initial two-part test for transfers; in other cases the taxpayer has the burden of proof to show that the use of its resources was NOT political intervention. The rule is intended to cover gifts of cash, cash equivalents, services, and use of materials, goods, or facilities, and also exchange transactions where the organization transfers goods or services on a fee basis, but receives less than fair market value in return, if the transfer is made in support of or in opposition to a candidate. This rule applies both to financial or in-kind support to candidates, parties, and political organizations, including coordinated communications or other activities if treated as a contribution under the relevant campaign finance law. Thus, payments for certain broadcast ads ("electioneering communications") required to be reported to the FEC would not automatically be treated as political intervention; such speech would be tested under Rule 4.

F. If the transfer of valuable support to a candidate, political party, or other 527 group that has the primary purpose of engaging in political intervention is not monetary but is treated as an in-kind contribution under applicable election law, it is, without any exceptions, political intervention. This covers providing services, materials, goods, or facilities of the organization, as well as that provided from others under the organization's direction, and includes speech and non-speech activities coordinated with a candidate's campaign.

G. Applying these standards, these are some results:

1) The use of an organization's staff time in a campaign would not be per se intervention under the IRS rule if there is a de minimis exception under applicable federal, state or local election law which makes this non-reportable as a political contribution. If the de minimis use of time is not protected by the fair-market-value safe harbor and is not allowed under a Revenue Ruling or other federal tax authority then the analysis proceeds to examine any facts and circumstances indicating that the use of resources is not political intervention (an analysis in which the organization bears the burden of proof).

2) Even without speech that refers to and reflects a view on a candidate, the use of an organization's resources to do selective or targeted GOTV in a federal election directed to neighborhoods or other groups suggested by a candidate's campaign would come under the federal election law's definition of an in-kind (coordinated) contribution and thus would be intervention under the IRS use of resources rule. A similar analysis would need to be done under applicable state or local law for state or local elections. If there is no coordination with the candidate's campaign and no transfer is made, but the organization on its own decides to target its GOTV to voters it believes are going to vote for a certain candidate, that use of resources would be evaluated under the last sentence in Rule 5 (facts and circumstances, as it is under present interpretations).

3) The use of an organization's name, trademarks, brands, goodwill, and other intangible assets (for instance, in the name of an affiliated 501(c)(4) entity or PAC conducting political activities), if not recognized as a contribution under applicable campaign finance laws, would not automatically be intervention under the IRS use of resources rule.^{± 5} It would still be treated as intervention if the organization is not able to bear its burden of proof under Rule 6, but we would carve out an explicit exception allowing sharing of name and marks with a related 501(c)(4), and allowing the 501(c)(4) in turn to share the name with a connected PAC. The use might also escape treatment as intervention if it is protected by some other federal tax authority exists.

4) Renting facilities or mailing lists, or selling other goods or services to a candidate's campaign at fair value, without offering the resource to the market generally or to competing candidates specifically, is still within the safe harbor and not intervention if: the goods or services are made available at fair market value and made available to other third parties, even if not rented or sold to other candidates (so this would be similar to other transactions conducted by the organization). As long as the organization is not refusing to rent or sell such items to an opposing candidate, the organization is doing this without preference for or against any candidate.

⁵ When use of resources DOES constitute a campaign or political contribution under applicable campaign finance law, but is not reportable under such law's relevant thresholds (and is not allowed under a Revenue Ruling or other federal tax authority), that use may still constitute political intervention should the organization (which bears the burden of proof in such instances) not be able to show why the use of resources is not political intervention under a facts and circumstances test.

Save the Canines, a tax-exempt organization, allows City Council Member W to use its auditorium, free of charge, for a Town Hall Forum to discuss City Council business, including a proposed dog park. W is running for reelection, and her campaign sets up a table in the auditorium handing out campaign literature, bumper stickers, and requests for campaign contributions. There is no written rental agreement, and Save the Canines officials are present at the event and do not say anything about the campaign activity. Under local election law, in-kind contributions of $500 or more must be reported as campaign contributions.

Because the cost of renting Save the Canines' auditorium is less than $500, providing free use of the space is not a reportable campaign contribution under local law. This is a use of the organization's resources in support of a candidate that is not specifically allowed under a Revenue Ruling or other federal tax authority. Save the Canines did not take any steps to prevent the use of the auditorium for campaign purposes. Save the Canines has engaged in political intervention.

Example 25

Following the forum, Save the Canines had DVDs made of the event and mailed it out to every household in the city, at a cost of $2,500. The mailing is considered a reportable campaign contribution under local election law, Save the Canines has intervened in the City Council election by making and mailing the DVDs.

Example 26

After serving on the City Council and as Mayor, W became her party's nominee to be Vice President of the United States. During the campaign, W's campaign sends out an email calling for a constitutional amendment that would impose proportional representation on the election of U.S. senators. The Executive Director of Save the Canines forwards W's email to Save the Canines' 1.5 million person email list without adding any comments. Under federal campaign finance law this is a republication of campaign materials and is considered a contribution to the candidate. Save the Canines has engaged in political intervention.

Example 27

Z, the Chair of Save the Canines' Board of Directors, hears a press report about high turnover rates among W's campaign staff. Knowing that Save the Canines' staff is loyal and resilient, Z asked those on the staff to volunteer on a full-time basis for the W campaign. Z and the Save the Canines Board feel that this would be a wonderful grass roots organizing experience for these staff members and would build the organization's contacts in the community and in government, so they vote to continue to pay the staff's salary during the period of time in which they would volunteer with the campaign. Save the Canines has engaged in political intervention by allowing its paid staff time to be used to support a campaign.

Example 28

Save the Canines has a very large endowment. Knowing this, the W for Vice President campaign approaches the Executive Director and asks for a loan to help offset the high legal and other costs that the campaign, W, and her family have incurred. The W campaign offers to pay 20% interest. Save the Canines makes the loan, and it is repaid by the campaign, with the 20% interest. Despite the above-market-rate interest being charged and paid, Save the Canines is not in the business of making loans and so the fair-market-value safe harbor would not apply. Further, the making of the loan is a contribution under federal election law and would thus be political intervention.

6. Facts and Circumstances: Communications that meet the threshold speech test, do not come within an exception, and are targeted to voters in states, districts, or other locations where close election contests are occurring, are conclusively political intervention. In other cases, evidence of other facts or circumstances, such as timing, the range of issues discussed, disclaimers and disclosures, the organization's history, the impartiality of its methods, or corrective steps taken, shall be considered only in the organization's defense:

(a) to meet its burden of proof that intervention did not arise from its communications or use of resources, by showing that the conduct furthered a proper exempt or business purpose and was unrelated to intervening in the campaign of any candidate for public office or

(b) as mitigating factors affecting the penalty or remedy to be imposed upon violations.

A. The facts and circumstances approach would be completely eliminated from all IRS judgments about whether a violation has occurred, in cases where the organization's conduct passes the bright line and safe harbor tests stated above. The only area remaining to be judged under a facts and circumstances approach would be the situation where an organization does not have the protection of the clear definitions or exceptions, there is sufficient evidence under Rule 4 or 5 to support a finding of political intervention, but the organization believes it has further evidence to demonstrate nonpartisanship and promotion of exempt purposes. Rule 6 provides a pathway for an organization to defend its conduct using favorable facts and circumstances.

B. Initially, however, there is one category of speech that would be conclusively political intervention under Rule 6: communications that refer to and reflect a view on a candidate, not within an exception, but targeted to voters in states, districts, or other locations where close election contests are occurring. This will require IRS regulations to objectively define "close" contests and what distinguishes "targeted" from untargeted communications.

1) "Close" contests could be defined as election campaigns in which at least two candidates are regarded as within a few percentage points of each other in public opinion polling reported in the mass media that serve the state or local jurisdiction in question (television, radio, general circulation newspapers, and web-based news outlets).

2) Alternatively, a broader set of contests could be comprehended by the term “competitive,” which would not depend on the shifting existence or credibility of polls or upon setting a certain point spread to be “close.” All that would be required is that two or more candidates are viable competitors in the election. This requirement would be satisfied if the communication reflects a view on a viable competitor to an incumbent. The geographical unit of analysis would be the electoral jurisdiction in which the public vote would determine the outcome. For presidential elections, this would be each of the states in which two or more candidates are viable contenders to obtain the state’s electoral votes, to win the state’s primary election, or to obtain delegates to the nominating convention. The organization should bear the burden of proof to show that the election is not competitive in that jurisdiction. If it does, then it may defend itself under a further analysis of the facts and circumstances under Rule 6. If it does not, then its communications referring to and reflecting a view on a candidate targeted to a particular jurisdiction would be conclusively political intervention.

3) It is our intent that “targeted” should mean that the organization has selectively chosen the location of the message based upon the impact it might have on the outcome of the vote. Thus, if an attempt is made to focus or concentrate the reach of the communication on the basis of a given nonpartisan demographic factor, such as income levels, ethnicity, gender, or proximity to the organization’s facilities, it is not selectively targeted even though some messages may reach voters in a battleground state. On the other hand, if the organization spends more money on communications in swing districts than it does elsewhere, the message has been targeted selectively. A message on national television regarding a presidential candidate would not be selectively targeted, but it would be targeted if it was limited to broadcast outlets in certain geographic regions. If the media markets selected primarily reach voters in swing states the message would be targeted to competitive races. Again, we stress that “selective targeting” is not determined by a subjective analysis of the organization’s motives or intentions, but requires identifying in well-crafted regulations those objective manifestations of speech and conduct that indicate political intervention is occurring.

4) If an organization is located in only one state or city, and a competitive election happens to be occurring there, its communications about the candidates there would ordinarily not be regarded as selectively targeted. But the communications would be selectively targeted if it received funding from a donor outside the area with the understanding that the funds would be spent on such local messages, or it was directed by its national affiliate to conduct the messaging. Paid mass media advertising should be regarded as more likely to be a selectively targeted form of communication than flyers, e-mail messages, letters to the editor, and the like. However, a local organization that makes an independent decision, with local funds, to communicate about a person who is a local candidate should not be treated as conclusively engaged in political intervention and should be able to defend itself based on other facts and circumstances.

5) We recognize that communications lacking express advocacy but reflecting views on candidates, selectively targeted to competitive elections, especially those employing paid mass media advertising, have been and are likely to continue to serve as vehicles to influence elections while attempting to avoid restrictions imposed by tax laws and campaign finance laws. If such communications do not come within bright line definitions designed to capture political intervention, and instead are subject to protracted examinations under “all the facts and circumstances,” the system of political tax law enforcement is likely to fail. Therefore, we recommend that the IRS and Treasury issue very precise regulations, and update them periodically as warranted, to identify and control the utilization of such evasive techniques.

C. In all other remaining situations, a variety of facts and circumstances could provide evidence of a proper exempt or business purpose unrelated to political intervention, including but not limited to timing, range of issues, whether they are “wedge” issues, use of political code words, factual credibility, disclaimers of partisanship, disclaimers of attribution of personal statements, basis for targeting (other than targeting to close elections), history, impartiality of preparation, external events, the reaction of candidates and the media, and the amount and nature of organizational resources used. The organization’s past record, corrective measures, and future safeguards are also relevant.

Alabama Senator Smith is up for re-election in November and the race is close. He is a heart attack survivor, a former smoker, and a nationally recognized figure. The Nationwide Cancer Association (NCA) office based in Washington, DC asks runs Senator Smith to record a public service announcement telling his story and warning about the dangers of smoking. The NCA buys air time to run the PSA nationwide in January, five months before the primary election. The PSA refers to and reflects a view on a candidate, but because the ad runs nationwide, it is not targeted and is therefore not conclusively political intervention.

Example 30

Same facts as in 30, but instead of running the PSA nationally, the NCA runs it on Alabama TV and radio channels and posts it on its state chapter’s website. NCA runs no similar ads involving public figures in non-battleground locations. The PSA is targeted to a close race. This communication does not include express advocacy, but refers to a clearly-identified candidate and reflects a view on that candidate. It does not fall within any of the safe harbor exceptions in Rule 4. This is conclusively political intervention as a targeted message even though it is connected to the organization’s exempt purpose.

Example 31

Same facts as in Example 31, but the PSA featuring Senator Smith was created by the NCA Alabama chapter and it runs in April. It is part of a series of ads sponsored by the Alabama chapter, each featuring a statewide “celebrity,” that is run every April for Healthy Heart Month.

This communication does not include express advocacy, but refers to a clearly-identified candidate and reflects a view on that candidate. It does not fall within any of the safe harbor exceptions in Rule 4. The ad is not targeted since it represents only a decision by the Alabama chapter to advertise in its own state, so it is not conclusively political intervention. Applying a facts and circumstances analysis, the organization can show that based on its history, the impartiality of its methods (using a variety of notable state figures who have been affected by smoking), and the timing of the series of ads, this communication was not political intervention.

Example 32

On October 5, Louisiana Moms Against Guns runs a final newspaper ad thanking Governor D for his courageous act in signing into law a bill banning the carrying of concealed weapons on school grounds, after running a series of ads urging him to do so. Louisiana Moms makes a practice of running “thank you” ads when the target of a lobbying campaign takes the requested action. Governor D is up for re-election in November. The Governor signed the bill on October 4. The ad does not include express advocacy, but refers to a clearly-identified candidate and reflects a view on that candidate. It is a paid mass media ad and therefore cannot fall within any of the safe harbor exceptions. Considering these as the only pertinent facts and circumstances, due to the close proximity of the ad to the official action, the fact that the ad does not mention the Governor’s reelection, and the organization’s history of running similar ads, the organization has met its burden of proof that intervention did not occur.

Example 33

Same facts as Example 33, but the Governor signed the bill on May 4. Based on the timing of the ad, the organization has not demonstrated that the ad furthered a proper exempt or business purpose and was unrelated to intervening in the campaign.

Example 34

On August 5, the day after a vote in Congress, Montana Moms Against Guns posts on its website an article showing how the two Senators voted on a bill banning the carrying of concealed weapons on school grounds. Senator L, who is up for re-election in November, voted for the bill, and Senator P, who is not up for re-election, voted against it. Montana Moms has been routinely posting news articles on the progress of the legislation in Congress on its website

The article does not include express advocacy, but refers to a clearly-identified candidate and reflects a view on that candidate. It does not fall within any of the safe harbor exceptions. The article does not refer to Senator L's re-election, and is limited to the single issue. The homepage of the organization’s website indicates that it believes concealed weapons should not be allowed on school grounds. Assuming these are the only relevant facts and circumstances, the organization has met its burden of proof that posting the article was unrelated to intervening in the campaign and was in furtherance of its exempt purpose.

Example 35

In a presidential debate, Candidate X stated that the HPV vaccination causes mental retardation. This is a demonstrably false statement, but it is being repeated by multiple news outlets. Organization P runs clinics for low-income women and advocates for access to health care. P has a long history of providing educational materials about sexual health issues based upon medical research. P has often used the press to contradict this falsehood when it appears in public statements made by others, so that girls and women will not be dissuaded from being vaccinated by false information. P's communications director immediately issues a press release and buys banner ads on political websites saying that "Candidate X needs to get her facts straight—research conclusively disproves her statement."

The communications do not fall within any of the safe harbor exceptions. However, provided there are no other relevant facts and circumstances, P has met its burden of proof that it was not intervening in the campaign.

Conclusion and Next Steps

The Bright Lines Project is underpinned by a convergence of opinion among nonprofit tax law experts, practitioners, and nonprofit leaders from across the nation that changes in the IRS political activity rules governing 501(c) organizations are needed. Beginning with a June 2009 retreat and continuing through a series of "listening sessions" and interviews, we have sought not only to identify ways to reduce the ambiguity in the IRS "facts and circumstances" test, but also to design a legal framework that will be clear and comprehensible to nonprofit professionals and laypeople involved in public policy advocacy work. The framework should also serve to provide neutral, objective standards for IRS employees to apply to applications for tax-exempt recognition and to examinations of exempt tax returns. It is our hope and belief that the safe harbors, bright lines, predictability, simplicity and ease of understanding that this proposal represents would enable more charities to participate in the civic life of our country safely and with integrity and for the IRS to enforce the law even-handedly.
