NAFTA’s Legacy for Mexico: Economic Displacement, Lower Wages for Most, Increased Immigration

NAFTA devastated Mexico’s rural sector, increased poverty

- The agricultural provisions of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), which removed Mexican tariffs on corn imports and eliminated programs supporting small farmers but did not discipline U.S. subsidies, led to widespread dislocation in the Mexican countryside. The price paid to Mexican farmers for the corn that they grew fell by 66 percent after NAFTA, forcing many to abandon farming.1 Mexico’s participation in NAFTA also required changing the Constitution’s land reform provisions that guaranteed small plots – “ejidos” – to the millions of Mexicans living in rural villages. As corn prices plummeted, indebted farmers lost their land, which newly could be acquired by foreign firms that consolidated prime acres into large plantations. As an exposé in the New Republic put it, “as cheap American foodstuffs flooded Mexico’s markets and as U.S. agribusiness moved in, 1.1 million small farmers – and 1.4 million other Mexicans dependent upon the farm sector – were driven out of work between 1993 and 2005. Wages dropped so precipitously that today the income of a farm laborer is one-third that of what it was before NAFTA. As jobs disappeared and wages sank, many of these rural Mexicans emigrated, swelling the ranks of the 12 million illegal immigrants living incognito and competing for low-wage jobs in the United States.”2

- Though the price paid to Mexican farmers for corn plummeted after NAFTA, the deregulated retail price of tortillas – Mexico’s staple food – shot up 279 percent in the pact’s first 10 years.3 This result stands in sharp contrast to promises by NAFTA’s boosters that Mexican consumers would benefit from the pact.

- Prior to NAFTA, 36 percent of Mexico’s rural population earned less than the minimum income needed for food, a share that grew by nearly 50 percent in the agreement’s first three years.4 On the 10-year anniversary of NAFTA, the Washington Post reported, “19 million more Mexicans are living in poverty than 20 years ago, according to the Mexican government and international organizations. About 24 million – nearly one in every four Mexicans – are classified as extremely poor and unable to afford adequate food.”5 Today, over half of the Mexican population, and over 60 percent of the rural population, still fall below the poverty line, despite the promises made by NAFTA’s proponents.6

After NAFTA, Mexican wages shrunk, poorly paid temporary employment grew

- Real wages in Mexico have stayed significantly below pre-NAFTA levels through the present. Today, Mexico’s minimum wage has 24 percent less value in real terms than in the year before NAFTA.7

- A 2006 comprehensive study found that inflation-adjusted wages for virtually every category of Mexican worker decreased over NAFTA’s first six years.8
  - The workers that experienced the highest losses of real earnings were employed women with basic education (-16.1 percent) and employed men with advanced education (-15.6 percent).
  - The only exception to the downward earnings trend was earnings for mobile-street vendors – the very poor people who hawk candy and trinkets on Mexican streets. Even in that category, earnings were still below their 1990 levels, and only slightly better than their 1994 levels.
  - Overall, there has been a shift from formal, wage- and benefit-earning employment to informal, non-wage- and benefit-earning employment under NAFTA. Even formal employment has shifted to carrying fewer benefits than it did prior to the pact’s passage.
  - Maquiladora (sweatshop) employment, where wages are almost 40 percent lower than those paid in heavy non-maquilla manufacturing, surged in NAFTA’s first six years. But since 2000, hundreds of...
NAFTA led to surge in immigration and dangerous U.S.-Mexico border crossings

- NAFTA’s boosters claimed that the pact would limit immigration. Former Mexican president Carlos Salinas for instance infamously said that the U.S. decision over NAFTA was a choice between “accepting Mexican tomatoes or Mexican migrants that will harvest them in the United States.”
- According to the Pew Hispanic Center, the number of people immigrating to the United States from Mexico remained steady in the three years preceding NAFTA’s implementation. However, the number of annual immigrants from Mexico more than doubled from 370,000 in 1993 (the year before NAFTA went into effect) to 770,000 in 2000 – a 108 percent increase.
- The number of undocumented immigrants in the United States (who are primarily Mexican) has increased 185 percent since NAFTA took effect, from 3.9 million in 1992 to 11.1 million in 2011.

Under NAFTA, Mexico missed chance to achieve European-level living standards

- An estimated 28,000 small and medium-sized Mexican businesses – many in retail, food processing and light manufacturing that were displaced by NAFTA’s new opening for U.S. big box retailers that sold goods imported from Asia – were destroyed in NAFTA’s first four years.
- The richest 20 percent of Mexico’s population collect over half of the nation’s income while the poorest 20 percent earn less than 5 percent. Despite the promises of NAFTA’s corporate proponents, the country’s income inequality index remains among the highest in the world.
- NAFTA supporters promised strong growth rates for Mexico upon implementing the deal. Yet, since NAFTA took effect, Mexico’s average annual per capita growth rate has been a paltry 1.2 percent. After nearly two decades of NAFTA, Mexico has only grown a cumulative 23 percent. In sharp contrast, from 1960 to 1980, Mexico’s per capita income grew 105 percent, or 3.7 percent on average per year. Mexico would be close to European living standards today if it had continued its previous growth rates.

ENDNOTES

9 Juan Arvizu, “Preocupa la falta de acuerdo migratorio,” El Universal (Mexico), April 24, 2005.

For more information, please visit Public Citizen’s Global Trade Watch at www.TradeWatch.org.